Determining the most overrated players is subjective and can vary based on individual opinions. However, during the 2019-20 Premier League season, some players received mixed reviews or were considered by some as overrated. Keep in mind that opinions may have changed since then, and these assessments were made at that specific time. Here are a few players who faced varying opinions during the 2019-20 season:

Paul Pogba (Manchester United):

Pogba has been a polarizing figure with some questioning if his performances justified the hype and price tag.

Mesut Özil (Arsenal):

Özil has been a talented player, but there were debates about his consistency and work rate during the 2019-20 season.

Dele Alli (Tottenham Hotspur):

Alli's performances were inconsistent during the 2019-20 season, leading to discussions about his form and impact on the pitch.

Jesse Lingard (Manchester United):

Lingard faced criticism for his lack of goals and assists during the 2019-20 season, which led to discussions about his role in the team.

Nicolas Pépé (Arsenal):

Pépé, despite being a big-money signing, had moments of inconsistency during his debut season in the Premier League, leading to questions about his overall impact.

It's important to note that opinions on players can change rapidly based on their performances, and these assessments may not reflect the current sentiments towards these players.
